

Adverbs of time

Introduction

The meeting finished early so I'm on my way home now. I'll see you later.

Definition

Adverbs of time tell us about time and duration.

Uses

We use them with verbs to answer the questions, "When?" and "How long?"

They can tell us exactly or less precisely when something happens and are often used as time markers in a narrative. We also use them to talk about duration.

Adverb	Meaning and use	Examples
ago	a time in the past	I started working here two years ago .  I decided to change jobs a long time ago .

for	a period of time - can be used with different tenses	I worked as an engineer for five years; now I'm a project manager. I've been a project manager for two years. I'm working at head office for a few weeks because they need help. I'm going to Italy for three weeks.
since	from a point in the past - usually used with perfect tenses	I've been a project manager since 2011. I'd worked as an engineer since leaving university but I wanted a change. I've been leading this team since I started.
still	continuing, not finished - maybe suggesting longer than expected	I asked him to send us a replacement but we're still waiting for it. My English is improving but I still find it difficult to speak on the phone.
after	following	We're having a meeting after lunch.

Construction

These adverbs have a variety of meanings and uses so there are no simple rules about word order. They might appear at the beginning, in the middle or at the end of a sentence depending on the structure or the tense.

Time markers

We use some adverbs of time when narrating a series of actions or events. For example, when telling a story, describing a process or giving instructions:

First, you need to find a suitable venue. Then agree on a date that is convenient for everyone and finally send reminders to everyone.

Firstly, all candidates will be interviewed by the panel. Secondly, they will have to give a short presentation. Next, the shortlisted candidates will be invited for a second interview. And finally the successful applicant will be notified by phone and the others by email.

Note that

1. First and firstly have the same meaning but firstly is a little more formal.
2. "At first" is not an adverb and has a different meaning from first and firstly. It refers to an early stage of something. For example:

I started working for a big company last year. At first, it was difficult to remember people's names but now I know nearly everyone.

I didn't like him at first but now we get on well together.

Similarly, 'at last' is not an adverb. It has a similar meaning to finally but emphasises that something has taken a very long time:

I looked everywhere for him. At last, I found him in the canteen.

Here's the train - at last!

3. Then has the same meaning as next in this context.

'During'

'During' is a preposition and is not used in the same way as for to talk about duration:

He worked here during three years. ❌
He worked here for three years. ✔️

'During' is used in these ways:

1. To talk about something that happens throughout a period of time:

This restaurant is open during the day. ✔️ [from some time in the morning until the evening]

The restaurant was open during one day last week. ❌
The restaurant was open for one day last week. ✔️

2. To talk about a more specific period:

During the company's first two years, it was successful. ✔️
During two years, the company was successful. ❌

3. To talk about something that happened at an unspecified point within a period of time:

She was born during the Second World War.
I sometimes wake up during the night.
He called me during the meeting.

Examples

Three weeks ago, we went to London for the weekend.

We couldn't find Jodi this morning. First we looked in her office. Then we tried the boardroom and finally found her in the canteen.

The figures have been better lately but we haven't reached our targets yet.

"It's lovely to see you again. What have you been doing since last time?" "Well, I got promoted recently so I've been travelling a lot. How about you?" "I'm still based here at the moment but I'm moving to the London office later this year."

"Here's the agenda. I've just finished it." "Thanks. How long will the meeting last, do you think?" "Not long - I've got to go straight to the airport afterwards so we're finishing earlier than usual." "Great - see you later."
